NORTH CADBURY COURT, YOUR OWN COUNTRY MANSION

“The house and its setting, right down to the housekeeping and facilities, are magnificent. The organisation and staffing was so smooth from the outset that we didn’t even notice it. We couldn’t have asked for more. With sincere gratitude”

HISTORY, FAMILY AND SOME VERY SPECIAL CHEESE

North Cadbury Court is a place where you feel immersed in British history, from the moment you approach along its tree lined drive. It dates back 700 years to 1300 – when it was a medieval hall. You can still see magnificent original beams in several rooms today.

In the 1580s Sir Francis Hastings built the large Elizabethan mansion you now see, with the ballroom and stunning Georgian style south façade added in the 1760s. In the interim one owner was unfortunately imprisoned by Oliver Cromwell (although thankfully forgiven a little later by King Charles III!).

In 1910 the house and estate were purchased by Sir Archibald Langman, a Londoner who yearned for rural pursuits. Archibald had recently returned from the Boer War where he and friend Arthur Conan Doyle took the amazing photographs you see in the house today (copies of which Queen Victoria hung at Windsor Castle).

Archibald and young wife Eleanor became active on the farm, and started making the cheddar cheese for which the estate is now world famous.

During World War II a London nursery was evacuated to the house, and then a large part of the house was lent to the YMCA to train under-privileged city boys in skills for farming, until the mid-1960s.

The house is now owned by the Montgomery family, grandchildren of Archibald and Eleanor, and forms part of their farmed estate. The lovely house is as iconic as the hill they farm, Cadbury Castle, visible from the windows, believed to be the site of King Arthur's Camelot.

Award-winning Montgomery cheese is still produced on the estate, and guests at the house can take tours of the cheesemaking, and sample it with local Somerset ciders.
